

“Saint George And The Dragon”

Once upon a time, there was a dragon attacking a kingdom. Frightened, people decided to deliver two lambs to the dragon every day to satisfy its hunger. If it wasn't hungry, it wouldn't attack their town. But, when the animals became scarce, they decided to send a chosen person by lot and only one lamb.

That family who suffered the loss of one of their members, devoured by the dragon, received, in compensation, all kinds of riches. Until one day, that the princess of the kingdom was chosen by lot to accompany the lamb.

In the dragon's cave, while she was waiting to be eaten, the princess met a knight, who was called George, who killed the dragon by nailing his sword into the beast's huge belly and saved her.

From the blood that flowed from the monster's lifeless body, a beautiful red rose bush was born. From the bush, George gave a big, beautiful red rose to the princess.

What they didn't know was that the rose was haunted and everyone who had it in their house would become a dragon. When the princess and George got home, they brought the rose to the King. When he took it, he became a new dragon. However, now he wanted to devour books instead of lambs or people.

In order to protect the citizens of the city, George made a plan.

They would lock the dragon king inside the village library and wait for him to devour all the books. When they saw him again, he was sleeping because he was very full. In fact, he had devoured all the books except one, “Don Quijote de la Mancha”. The book was too big for him to eat.

In order for the king to stop being a dragon, he had to devour the rose that turned him into one. When he did it, he began to repeat dialogues of knights from famous books such as King Arthur of the round table. When he finished eating the rose, the dragon exploded and scattered roses throughout the city, and all the citizens took them and danced. They all imagined that it was a celebration. Suddenly, they were all dragons and the princess and saint George had no choice but to flee town in a desperate hurry.
